Hiring Team
Huntress

Dear Huntress Team,

I've spent the past decade deep in the exact challenge you describe—figuring out how to sell security to people who don't want to buy it. As someone who's led product marketing for secure collaboration and backup products, I've learned that traditional fear-based messaging doesn't work. What does? Bold storytelling, direct value framing, and connecting security to productivity, simplicity, or business continuity. That's why I'm so excited about this role—and the chance to help Huntress reshape how the SIEM market talks about itself.

At SpiderOak, I led go-to-market strategy and messaging for both SpiderOakONE and CrossClave, working closely with engineering, product, and sales to frame complex cryptographic systems in ways that resonated with real buyers. I've built launch plans, technical copy, onboarding scripts, and full funnel marketing campaigns in B2B and B2G contexts. I've also worked directly with MSPs—co-developing sales assets, building lifecycle campaigns, and aligning messaging across partner programs.

What excites me most about Huntress's approach is the clarity of purpose. You're not trying to outdo other SIEM vendors on jargon or features—you're telling a different story. That's exactly the kind of product marketing I've always gravitated toward: positioning that's creative, grounded, and bold.

I'd love to bring my experience, energy, and storytelling skills to help make Huntress's SIEM platform a category leader—and have a lot of fun doing it. Thanks for considering, and I look forward to connecting soon.

Warmly,
Adam Tervort
