

Dear Warp team,

Last year, I couldn't code. Today, I ship features daily—and Warp is the reason I never want to go back to a traditional terminal. When I discovered your tool through an Every.to article and started pairing it with Claude Code and Factory Droid, something clicked: the terminal wasn't just a command line anymore. It became my workbench for building things I never thought I could build.

This transformation is why I'm writing. Not because I need another Operations role (I have one), but because I genuinely believe Warp is building the future of how developers—and soon, everyone—will work with computers. And I've spent the last decade preparing for exactly the operational challenges you're facing.

At SpiderOak, I've been the "whatever the business needs most" person. Built five departments from scratch. Helped raise $13M. Turned customer retention around by 25%. But here's what matters for Warp: I've lived through the exact transition from "we need someone to handle everything" to "we need to hire functional leaders." I know when to build scrappy systems that work today versus infrastructure that scales tomorrow. I've been the CEO's right hand through fundraising, board meetings, and the thousand fires that come with growth.

You mentioned partnerships, pricing, and business development opportunities left on the table. At SpiderOak, I led our pricing overhaul and partnership explorations while juggling IT, HR, and finance—because that's what the business needed. I'm not a vertical expert; I'm a strategic generalist who learns fast and delivers results.

But here's the real reason I'm perfect for this: I'm living proof of your mission. AI turned me from a non-coder into someone who ships code daily. I don't just understand your product intellectually—I depend on it. And I want to help more developers (and non-developers!) experience that same transformation.

Want to talk about how we scale Warp into the platform every developer can't live without? I'd love to talk with your team to see if I will be a good fit.

Adam Tervort adam@adamtervort.com 816-929-5261